One of the gloomiest of Shakespeare One of the gloomiest of Shakespeare's tragedies, "Othello," was chosen by Charles D. Herman and the Warde company for the opening of their engagement at the Grand last night. There is hardly a light line in the play, with its plotting and counter-plotting, its unnecessary overthrow of innocence and its temporary triumph of most contemptible will the contemptible of the contemptible o e carefully avoids the ranting, the ing up and down stage, the roaring ny that so many aspiring actors work "Othello." Instead, his acting unghout is more or less of the ressed but far more effective character, ent at times, when outbreaks are but ural. Another thing that may be if of Mr. Herman is that he takes no rties with the text. He does not try improve upon Shakespeare, but sticks hfully to the lines as they were tten.

It is not pleasant to criticise such a performance as that of "Macbeth" by John Griffith and his company at the Salt Lake Theatre last night. But, by the same token, it is not pleasant to sit through such a performance. Shakespeare never drew a more unlovely character than that of Macbeth, the man who was inordinately ambitious, but who was too weak and cowardly to use his own right arm in advancement of his plans. And the character is not unlovelier than Mr. Griffith's presentation.

Last night's star is one of the old-timers who believes that every strong sentence should end with the exclamation "Ah!" Mr. Griffith probably doesn't know it, but this is extremely disagreeable as well as out of date. It was not our pleasure to see Mr. Griffith in "Faust" when he appeared here (at the Grand) some time ago, but his Faust must have been better than his Macbeth. The rest is left to the imagination of the reader.
